ISRAEL ZANGWILL

One by one they are dropping off—the handful of great Jews who represent the creative forces in Jewish life. In the past few years the toll was heavy. Neumark, Mordecai Spector, Isaac Hourwitz, are but a few of the number who have disappeared from the scene. And as each of them went, we could not escape the feeling that their death was inexorable and relentless, wreaking its damage with tragic finality. These men died—and they were swallowed up instantly, leaving scarcely a trace behind them. They did their work in life, but they left no heirs behind them to carry on their torch. Their worlds died with them. Indeed in some cases their worlds had died before they did, and they had been left stranded in a void. Jewish life changes so much, so crazily, so abnormally. These few great Jews had each typified an era, a point of view, a phase of Jewish living. And when they died their places had already shifted. They had been crowded out. Their death was a final scene that heightened the poignancy of an already harrowing tragedy.

In considering forces and personalities in Jewish life, we had to pause at the name of Zangwill. He surely symbolized a definite moment in recent Jewish history. Zangwill—we needed but to mention the name and we knew exactly the conditions, the circumstances, the set of ideas that he represented. He was one of the most distinct personalities in contemporary Jewry.

Zangwill was one of the very few Jewish writers, outside of Yiddish and Hebrew, who envisaged Jewish existence as a balanced and full life. Accurately speaking, it is only in Yiddish literature that we find a direct, unmediated picture of Jewish life. To the Yiddish writer, the ordinary Jew, with his simple every-day concerns is a human being possessed of the primal qualities of a human. Even the Hebrew writer suffers somewhat in his observations of Jewish motives from the interposition of the language barrier between himself and his subject. In European literature assuredly one feels that Jews are not properly understood. The approach is always one from without. Jewish life is depicted and dealt with not because its cross-play of concerns has stimulated its artists to expression, but because some outsider thinks he can find some piquant material to intrigue the jaded taste of sensation-seekers. The use of a non-Jewish language seems to have the effect of screening off the finer nuances of Jewish life from the writer and reader. Zangwill was one man who succeeded in putting his subjects at their ease, as it were, and being able to catch the subtlest notes of their motives. Zangwill's people confide in him and admit him into the most private sanctuaries of their life. They are not problems to be dissected. They are simple people who live because they are alive. Zangwill shares their life and understands them.

The life that Zangwill used as his material was the life of the Jewish immigrant in England. Whitechapel was a bit of Poland or Lithuania transplanted into England. The currents of life there had their source in the deeper wells of Jewish life in Russia. Zangwill felt that their life had a certain vigour and richness which it was drawing from Eastern Europe. In standing close to this life Zangwill was therefore close to the parent source—Jewish life in Russia. And it was this sympathy with the rich Jewish life in Eastern Europe that gave vitality and depth to Zangwill's description of Jewish life in England.

Zangwill was not only an artist. He was also a leader who took his full share in the practical affairs of his people. Was it his fine understanding of his people and his sympathy with their hardships that led him to step into the arena of communal activities? Zangwill was a complete Jew who felt that his place was among his people to help them fight their battles against bigotry and prejudice. There was not a movement or an organization aiming at promoting Jewish welfare that did not number Zangwill among its active participants. Zangwill was always on the lookout for any worthy Jewish cause that he might give it merited support.

English Jewish life has changed since Zangwill first took notice of it. Immigration into England has been checked. The Jewish masses are not getting reinforcement from Eastern Europe. They are sinking ever deeper into a morass of ignorance and indifference. The more intelligent ones are seeking shelter behind the formulas of Zionism. The wealthy class is rapidly assimilating, attempting to adopt the manner of English aristocracy. So that on the whole there is now lacking that genuinely Jewish life which Zangwill at first found in England. English Jewdom is disintegrating. Instead of being a simple, natural whole, it is now a problem, a subject for speculation.

Zangwill at one time was the artist and the spokesman of Jewish life in England. Because it was simple and wholesome, it was possible for a Zangwill, an artist, to be a leader. We know well enough that in America where Jewish life is chaotic, it is impossible for a mere intellectual to assume a leading role in the sphere of communal activities. Here it is possession of wealth that confers the privilege of leadership. In England Zangwill carried on the Jewish tradition of the learned man being at the head of affairs.

Zangwill's people have changed. Their conditions of living have changed. Zangwill could no longer be their prophet. In the new England Zangwill was lost. His footing was taken away from under him. Most of the big Jews of the older generation were in the same predicament. The writers who had been reared in a Jewish atmosphere and had sensed its subtle pressures suddenly found themselves living in an alien world, lacking the fine play of Jewish forces to which they had been accustomed. Jewish life is losing its character, its individuality. And because of this lack of harmonious purpose in Jewish life there is the consequent lack of a deep and penetrating Jewish literature. Some of the more gifted Yiddish writers have succeeded in detecting a note of harmony underneath the chaos of Jewish existence. But assuredly no writers in English have come near to success. The subject is entirely too vast and bewildering for them. Had Zangwill come at a later stage it is possible that his "Melting Pot" would have been as valuable as his "Ghetto Tragedies." In the latter book Zangwill was at home in his subject. In the former he was groping.

In the sphere of practical affairs, Zangwill's artistic capacity for finding the simple, unfitted him for coping with the complexities in the new welter of Jewish life. Zangwill looked for the straight, direct course. He sought for solutions in the very character of Jewish life. He found chaos for which he could not devise a comprehending formula.

An Attractive Investment in Nova Scotia

By June, 1927, the earnings of the Avon Power Co., Limited, Nova Scotia, after deducting full maintenance and operating costs, will, it is expected, be sufficient to pay interest requirements on the First Mortgage Bonds more than twice over.

The company enjoys a steady demand for power from municipalities and industrial concerns throughout the eastern section of the ancient Annapolis Valley. Recent purchases of other properties provide for steady growth.

We recommend the First Mortgage 5½% Sinking Fund Gold Bonds of this company as an investment of satisfactory yield and ample security.

Israel Zangwill

Israel Zangwill, author and playwright, died August 1 in London after a week's illness. He was sixty-two.

Mr. Zangwill made his first reputation as an author with "The Children of the Ghetto and Other Tales of Jewish Life."

Last September he became a theatre manager in London, producing his own plays. He announced he hoped to mix popular with serious drama, "making the popular pay for the highbrow."

Zangwill was a propagandist for Zionism many years and since the establishment of the Jewish National Home he had continued his efforts for Jews in Palestine with such energy that he used to say jokingly that his enemies believed he intended to make himself King of Jerusalem after the expulsion of the Arabs.

Israel Zangwill was born in London in 1864 and was virtually self-educated except for instruction received in the English elementary schools, but this fact did not prevent his winning a B.A. degree with honour in London University. He was first a teacher, then a journalist and afterward an author, having written novels, essays, poems and plays, besides lecturing in Great Britain and Ireland, Jerusalem, Holland and the United States.

He was married in 1903 to Miss Edith Ayrton, daughter of the late Prof. W. A. Ayrton, herself an author. They had two sons and one daughter. Mr. Zangwill was president of the Jewish Historical Society of England, ex-president and honourary member of the Playgoers' Club, president of the Jewish Drama League, and a member of the Dramatists' Club.

Mr. Zangwill was a prolific writer, but the two works by which he is best known in America are probably "Children of the Ghetto," published in 1892, and "The Melting Pot," brought out in 1908. His last visit to this country was in the fall and winter of 1923-24, when he delivered the opening address to the American Jewish Congress and stayed to criticize everything American except our subway turnstiles and cafeterias.

Fifteen years before he came here to attend the premiere of "The Melting Pot" at Washington. The play was dedicated to President Roosevelt and the opening was attended by him with his entire cabinet.

Mr. Zangwill stirred nation-wide comment and controversy on his last visit here, both by his critical comments on everything and by his assertion that "political Zionism is dead." He attacked the British mandate in Palestine as "betraying" the Jews and converting Palestine into a homeland for the Arabs rather than a refuge for the long-scattered tribes of Israel.

So great was the dissension stirred in Zionist ranks that it was at one time reported Samuel Untermyer, president of the Palestine Foundation Fund, would resign. Mr. Untermeyer, Nathan Straus and Rabbi Stephen S. Wise took exception to Mr. Zangwill's views.

Mr. Zangwill declared Prohibition a joke, America itself a joke and the manners of the people frightful. He criticized Henry Ford, and his audiences rebelled and received his remarks in stony silence or, as at the National Arts Club, cheered the remark of one listener, that Zangwill had "gone far enough."

As a result of the storm, Mr. Zangwill suddenly became silent for three weeks. Characteristically he defended his criticisms by saying "One has to be impertinent in America in order to escape the impertinence of every one else."

Mr. Zangwill was one of the chief supporters of the late Theodore Herzl, founder of the modern Zionist movement, and helped promote, as well, the Galveston Immigration Scheme, financed by Jacob Schiff, to divert immigration from eastern ports. He was always an aggressive exponent of unlimited immigration.

When the Jewish "Tribune" conducted a poll of American Jewry in 1923 on the greatest living member of the race Mr. Zangwill ran first until the closing days of the ballot, when he dropped to third place. Albert Einstein and Chaim Weizmann, head of the World Zionist movement, were voted first and second respectively.

POLITICAL CLUB SPEAKERS

An organization meeting in support of Louis Wolfe, official Liberal-Conservative candidate in Cartier Division held at the Central Committee Rooms, 859 St. Lawrence Boulevard, Monday evening, August 2, under the joint chairmanship of Mrs. Owen Campbell, president of the Women's Conservative Club, T. J. Griffin and Jules de Lorimer, was addressed by A. Harry Wolfe, M. Rosenberg, Dr. M. Lightstone, A. Dupuis, Isidore Freedman, Jacob de Witt, K.C., Mrs. N. E. Gobeil, S. Thompson, Louis Caplan, Louis Charron, J. Wilfrid Shaw, who brought a greeting from the Notre Dame de Grace Conservative Association and W. R. Bulloch.

Better Homes for the Woman Who Can Appreciate the Improvement

By MARTIN ARNOVITZ, Secretary-Treasurer of Neumann Realties Limited

A woman can tell a well built and carefully planned home more quickly than a man can choose a nice automobile. From long experience the builder has come to know this, and because he realizes that salesmanship alone will not satisfy his customer, he builds the sort of home that a woman wants to live in. The salesman in the building lines finds that his house must be right up to the minute in every way. Unless he can please the home-maker he must pay the penalty of building an inferior house by living himself in the home he built for others. The first consideration is location and exterior. The lawn and the verandah are important, but the garden and the general colour scheme are no less so. The pleasant harmonious arrangement of colours and flowers may induce the buyer to make up her mind. The interiors can be only satisfactory to her if the rooms are built with just ordinary horse sense and with an eye to good selection of colours and choice materials. In the layout which is very important, horse sense should again be the guiding note. No one wants a bathroom or kitchen anywhere near the reception hall, any more than radiators in the centre of a room when corners are just as convenient. The woman of experience insists on high-grade hardware throughout, especially on the windows, and she will be disappointed unless there are plenty of clothes closets, base plugs for electric lamps and general service, an ironing-board and a built-in refrigerator. The builder's salesman knows that the new type of buyer makes a bee line for the kitchen when she is inspecting a new house. The modern woman wants her "plant" to be as efficient as her hubby's office. The breakfast nook helps her to plan her work by saving a great deal of time and energy.

Next comes the bathroom which is perhaps the most important room in the whole house. It is by the appearance of the bathroom that the guest forms first impressions. A good-sized room with tiled flooring and walls, a built-in bath, a separately partitioned off lavatory, a pedestal basin and a shower stall; the whole of the best hardware equipment make up an every day bathroom that is sure to please. The builder who watches these few things is sure to satisfy the public in its demand for better homes to live in. It might be of interest to note that the cost of house and lot is compared on this basis—that a house should not cost more than four times or less than three times the value of the lot. Judging by the hundreds of thousands of dollars involved in transactions at the moment, Montreal contractors are confident of an exceptionally good future. The general speculations are in apartment buildings rapidly nearing completion in the vicinity of Westmount, but the smaller speculator has found that small properties on the side streets near Ste. Catherine Street, may, with profit, be altered and converted into up-to-date premises. Such investment is particularly advantageous in the vicinity of the Mount Royal Hotel.

"Longueil is fast becoming a second Brooklyn and our Sherbrooke Street of old is a slightly smaller 5th Avenue, New York."—This from a real estate salesman is indicative of the building activities in Montreal and environs.

The Habimah Hebrew Theatre Company of Moscow, which has had a very successful season in Austria, was refused permission to enter Hungary, on the ground that the members of the company were Russian Jews.

The Constitutional Issue at Ottawa

By EDWARD TRELAWNEY

EDITORIAL NOTE.—A dispassionate discussion of the constitutional questions which have arisen out of the political situation in Canada. The writer quotes illuminating precedents from British constitutional history and shows their bearing upon the federal issue at Ottawa.

The present political crisis raises some interesting questions concerning our constitution as established by law and by precedent. Much loose thinking and looser speaking is being indulged in, to the detriment of clear vision, exact understanding and just appreciation. It is worth while to glance at the confusion in the light of exact statement.

1. With whom rests the authority to dissolve parliament? The answer is that it lies between the persons authorized by the elected chamber, representing the present national majority, and the crown as representing the entire nation in its continuous aspect. Some rhetorical utterances have referred to Cromwell as affording a precedent for the action of His Excellency in determining the appropriate circumstances in which dissolution will be sanctioned. As a matter of good history it is Cromwell who affords Mr. King a basis for argument. The Cromwellian policy set forth the right of the House of Commons by its existing majority to determine when it should be dissolved. This doctrine of the absolute authority of the elected chamber has never been acceded to by any self-governing people since the Cromwellian despotism which had such unhappy sequels. In Britain protection was sought in the Triennial Act, which limited the life of parliament to three years, and more recently under the auspices of the greatest Liberal parliamentarian of this age, to five years. Quite clearly, as Professor Pollard has pointed out in his "Evolution of Parliament," the more powerful the elected chamber becomes, the more needful it is that there shall be some protection against its absolutism. In other countries other forms of protection are sought. The French Republic allows the dissolution of the chamber outside of its regular time limit only with the approval of the senate. The United States, which has not adopted the plan of responsible government, does not allow any one to dissolve the representative chamber—its life is regulated to the calendar alone. There is no British law or constitutional principle to warrant the claim that the ministers of the crown may at any time demand a dissolution of the parliament solely because they as the ministers for the time being deem that dissolution to be expedient. Something more than the fact of being the ministers of the crown is needed to invest them with authority.

2. Is the crown under obligation always to act on the advice of his ministers? If so, under the form of responsible government the reality can be nullified. Can the ministers of the day demand from the crown through by virtue of their advice as ministers whatever action they deem expedient? If so, once those ministers have been appointed, they can work any changes in the constitution which they may desire. The very object of a constitution as apart from statutes, is to make such arbitrary action impossible. The mere fact of having been appointed a minister of the crown and having had the support of the House of Commons does not confer an unrestricted right to determine the actions of the crown for all time. What then determines the time at which such power, having been temporarily constituted, lapses? The obvious answer is that the crown must recognize as his advisers such ministers as he knows to have the support of the House of Commons. How does he become acquainted with that fact? Not by reading the newspapers or by casting election news, but either by an address from the House itself or by the report of his ministry through the prime minister. When Mr. King sets forth the claim, as he has set it forth, that because he was at one time the minister fulfilling these qualifications he remained so until he chose to resign, he sets up a doctrine which is quite new in law and history.

In the case before us the question is whether the Governor-General had any constitutional knowledge that the person offering advice when Mr. King advised dissolution was at that time a minister qualified according to the constitutional requirement. Mr. King says that his government had been undefeated throughout four years. But in saying this he does not cover the whole situation. The question which concerned the Governor-General was whether at the time of offering advice the prime minister thus commanded the confidence of the House. To this the sufficient answer is that Mr. King admittedly informed His Excellency that he no longer had such command of the House as enabled him to carry on the King's Government with dignity. The moment that admission was made his authority was subject to question. It is utterly beside the mark to ask whether the crown may give to one minister what it refuses to another regardless of their actual authority at the time of asking. Conceivably the one may be clothed with the confidence of the House which is required, while the other minister is not in that position. This is not a case when we may say simply that one equals one, one minister is the equivalent of another minister. The issue concerns two ministers in very different situations. The precise nature of that difference does not for the moment concern us—we will deal with it presently. What does concern us at this moment is the fallacy of assuming that the advice of one prime minister is always equal in authority to that of another.

To assume otherwise, as is now being done by some speakers, would allow the Governor almost indefinitely to continue in office ministers who used this prerogative regarding dissolution to shelter themselves from their responsibility. The undue postponement of a session of parliament with a view to enabling ministers to evade responsibility would be an abuse of authority. If for instance to facilitate such a course over an undesirable period Mr. Meighen were to ask for warrants to take the place of voted supplies the Governor would be justified in refusing such warrants.

Thus we see that there is a constitutional authority more permanent than that phase of national life recognized in the majority of the House of Commons. That abiding reality is symbolized in the crown. Nay, it is not only symbolized, it is actually recognized and found in the crown.

3. The case of Lord Aberdeen and Sir Charles Tupper has been referred to recently. But it must be remembered that His Excellency declined to endorse certain proposed appointments on the ground that the advice was given by a prime minister who did not either then or at any previous time possess the confidence of the House of Commons. Sir Charles had been appointed prime minister after the dissolution of parliament and had appealed to the electors only to meet decisive rejection. When Sir Charles found it needful to inform His Excellency that he would not be able to meet the parliament so elected with any hope of enjoying its confidence he surely had no further claim upon the confidence of the crown. Lord Aberdeen by rejecting recommendations presented by such a minister vindicated the rights of the nation to advise the crown only through a prime minister who possessed the confidence of the House of Commons. Responsible government was defended not violated by the Governor-General of that day.

4. Has a prime minister the right to repeat an appeal to the electors after being defeated in a House of Commons elected in response to an appeal by himself? This is a totally different question from the other one: namely, may a Governor-General with propriety refuse to one prime minister a dissolution which he will grant to another? For the sake of calm reflection we may as well get away from controverted matters and root our thought in undisputed precedents.

In 1885 Mr. Gladstone's government was defeated in the British House of Commons by a small majority on a trifling question. The government, however, knew that the defeat was no accident; and however it might be wiped out by a fresh resolution of confidence the time had come when Mr. Gladstone could no longer carry on the Queen's government with dignity. He at once resigned and the Queen expressed no pretence of regret in accepting the resignation. She sent for Lord Salisbury, who found himself unable to wind up the business of the session without assurances from the Liberal leader that the new government would be allowed to complete the uncontroverted business of the session, and to obtain enough supply to carry on. On a previous occasion the Conservative leader refused to accept office under such conditions, thus compelling a discredited ministry to go on deeper and deeper into confusion. But such procedure, however profitable to partisans, is not worthy of the ministers of the crown whose first law is that the King's government must be carried on. Mr. Gladstone therefore, while finding it most distasteful, gave the required assurances in 1885 and Lord Salisbury's ministry after a few weeks of work closed the session and then appealed to the country. The House by enabling them to carry on sustained them—it did not reject the new ministry. Thus Lord Salisbury in asking for dissolution was not appealing from a House having been elected on his appeal and finally rejecting him. The case was entirely different from that of Mr. King, who desired to appeal to an electorate to which only a few months before he had appealed and which had given him a House that had now avowedly lost confidence in his government.

The sequel to this provides us with more precedents exactly relevant to our situation. According to The Times the election which followed gave Mr. Gladstone 333 supporters, and accorded to Lord Salisbury only 251. But during the election there had been more or less of an understanding between the Conservatives and the Irish Nationalists who now elected 86 of their men. Lord Salisbury thus emerged from the election with 251 straight Conservatives and 86 Irish of a party which had officially recognized the Conservative party as their friends in that election. Thus ostensibly Lord Salisbury had 337 against Mr. Gladstone's 333. True, he had the smaller number of the two main parties but with the support of the irregulars he could carry on. The constitution knows nothing of parties, only of ministers able to command a majority of members. So he decided to face the parliament precisely as did Mr. King this year under precisely similar circumstances. No one dreamed of challenging the propriety of this action, nor was there any more ground for challenging Mr. King's similar decision last winter. But there was an exceptional feature in 1886. Between the election and the opening of the House, Mr. Gladstone had managed to impress the Irish that they might profit by supporting him rather than their allies in the election; and soon after the opening of parliament a vote was carried against the Tory government. Did Lord Salisbury ask for a dissolution? Not he; he knew too well what was constitutional. Yet it ever there were a case which would justify a second appeal it was at that moment. For a new issue had suddenly arisen and for the first time a great party had since the election reversed the platform on which it had been elected. Elected like Mr. King in response to an unsuccessful appeal to be made independent of the third party, it now proposed alliance with that party which it had proposed to resist. What more radical change could be imagined than in this adoption of a Home Rule policy? Yet Lord Salisbury never dreamed of setting aside the usage by asking a new dissolution of his own House. One must therefore admit that the established and unchallenged usage of the British

David A. Brown, chairman of the United Jewish Campaign, charged that Zionists attacked the Campaign because the Joint Distribution Committee had refused to enter into a secret agreement with the Zionist Organization whereby any deficit of the Keren Hayesod would have been covered by proceeds of the United Jewish Campaign. Then Emanuel Neumann, general director of the United Palestine Appeal, challenged Brown to withdraw the charge. Brown has replied. So the two are now standing off and throwing mud and shouting bad names at each other.

Brown says that one of the other boys, Louis Lipsky, started the whole thing and this is quite likely. Not satisfied with the prosperity of the United Palestine Appeal, Lipsky, president of the Zionist Organization of America, in his annual message, went out of his way to raise again the issue of Crimean colonization. He said that "this relief action was coupled with propaganda calculated to undermine the Zionist position, to place a rival in the field against Palestine and Zionism." Lipsky bragged that "the Russian colonization project has become a pigmy" and gave the Zionist Organization's "self-restraint, tact and unification" as the reason.

Now Brown accuses Emanuel Neumann of being Lipsky's "man Friday" and more recent insults have been exchanged between Brown and Neumann. Brown makes more than a veiled threat to the effect that he has the whole story of the "intrigue and cheap politics of that group who live on Zionism, a story which, if placed before the Jews of America, would result in throwing into the discard the so-called leaders of American Zionism." So, far, far into the night, as Briggs, the cartoonist, says. The fight is on for the delectation of the paying Jewish public which must tear itself away from the business of "upbuilding the Jewish homeland" and helping the starving Jews of Russia, for a little well-deserved entertainment.

It should be done right. It could be a duel, ten paces back of some garage, with Brown and Neumann choosing their weapons in the grand manner, but one-hundred-per-cent. American gentlemen don't fight that way these days. They doubtless prefer the manly art of fistic combat. Each could go in training for it now and for every ten pounds shy a man could be allowed a horseshoe in his glove. The show at Boyle's Thirty Acres, just outside New York, could be made what Brown himself would most certainly call a "knock-out," and the gate receipts could be divided between the United Jewish Campaign and the United Palestine Appeal. Both Brown and Neumann, in the course of a day's occupation, talk a lot about how good Jews sacrifice time, energy and money for a worthy cause. Would either be willing to risk a black eye or a cauliflower ear as a personal offering to Palestine or the Crimean colonization?

Of course personal combat might not settle anything and such a spectacle might lose Brown and Neumann the respect of docile, heretofore unquestioning followers and generous contributors. But neither does the present orgy of Billingsgate, bombast and vituperation settle anything and it certainly dissipates respect for each man. The present rumpus is enough to make the average paying Jew suspicious of the conduct of the big campaigns. It befogs the important fact that there is room for both Palestine and the Crimean project in this life and no need for shoving. Worst of all, the bad behaviour of Brown and Neumann weakens the allegiance of the people to causes which must be helped and which should not be allowed to suffer through personal backbiting and shoddy leadership.

Times change and new birds bring new songs, as a poet once said. The Jewish Tribune in its old form used to live out on the Pacific coast, one of many small English-Jewish papers. Now it is the result of the union between the Hebrew Standard and the former Jewish Tribune. It is less scholarly and more banal, lives in New York City and puts on airs. In days gone by some of its copy was obtained "by scissors or nothing," and whether the proper source always got the credit is at least a question. The Tribune clipped from other papers and the other papers clipped from it and neither clipper heard itself called thief.

There were then no bureaus grinding out publicity for the English-Jewish papers to use as news and to spread free. There were not so many organizations, institutions, agencies and what-nots for the good and welfare of American Jewry as there are to-day with paid secretaries and publicity writers who, in order to hold their jobs, must show how many agate lines they get into print annually free. There were no syndicates offering articles by the very best Jewish writers of the period for something like $2.50 per article. Material was not turned out in tons and clipping was the order of the day.

Now the Jewish Tribune turns to righteous indignation because the Jewish Review and Observer, of Cleveland, Ohio, lifts a portion of an article, makes it an editorial and fails to give credit to the real source. The Tribune calls this lapse from virtue "a breach of professional ethics"; and so it is, strictly speaking. But how many people read both papers and compare them in a world troubled with wood alcohol poisonings and "off summers"? Who knows who cares and what difference does it make? As the woman said nearly in "Merton of the Movies": "Well—why not?"

This paper has similar experiences. What the Review and Observer is to the Tribune the Jewish Ledger of Rochester is to the CANADIAN JEWISH REVIEW. But humour is a better salve to the situation than an upstage lecture on "Professional Ethics." The Tribune should be more lenient with its inland country cousin remembering the stones by which it made its own ascent.

The sudden death of Rabbi Herbert J. Samuel, of Temple Emanu-El, Montreal, coming as it did immediately after he had finished an address before the convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, was as tragic as it was dramatic. A man "of extreme gentleness, fine simplicity, (and) scholarly attainments," to quote from Rabbi B. R. Brickner's eulogy of his fallen colleague; the descendant of a long line of British rabbis, and kinsman of Sir Herbert Samuel, much might have been expected from him, for he was only forty-four when death overtook him. Besides his rabbinical ministrations he served the Jewish community by his fine editorials which appeared weekly in the CANADIAN JEWISH REVIEW. We extend our sympathy to his bereaved family, to his congregation and to Canadian Jewry.—Jewish Tribune

The Wondering Jew

In America, with the advent of prosperity, the attitude assimilating Jews adopt towards anti-Semitism has no longer remained in sole possession of the Reformers; the mood has spread until anyone, from a philanthropic semi-Zionist to a tremulous ghetto Communist, shares it. It is precisely by means of this mood and attitude that we can most accurately gauge the spiritual erectness of Jewry on this continent. After all, anti-Semitism in America has remained as yet a thing of petty annoyances and superficial irritations. It is scarcely that brooding, volcanic mountain of hate casting ominous shadows over a helpless people; belching poisonous lava upon unresisting victims—Eastern Europe. There have been no pogroms here; discrimination is widespread but not violent.

Yet those Jews who would escape not only anti-Semitism but the irksome responsibilities of Judaism are frightened and stand aghast. They are becoming just a little frantic. Newly-rich Jews who have been refused admittance at exclusive hotels organize forums and meetings or hysterically write to the press. Wearisome speeches are made, having as their perennial theme: Jewish contributions to civilization. For the worried apologist every mediocre artist becomes a Jewish genius; the chauvinism which could more appropriately rest with Jewish nationalists is borne, like the Ark of the Lord, by their most determined antagonists. And so the ludicrous whitewashing of the Jew to show what a really good fellow he was, is, and will be, grows apace. In the attempt at beatification, of spreading the patriotism, merits and virtues of the Jew in the latest fashion of high-pressure salesmanship, the words of Max Nordau are forgotten: "The Jews are not hated because they have evil qualities; evil qualities are sought in them because they are hated." In particular, the American-Jewish magazines and papers propagandize to a sickening extent upon the beauties of Judaism, the origins of Christianity, and what is for them most important, the similarity between Jew and Gentile.

Some of these Jews who are so perturbed over anti-Semitism would prostitute the Judaism of their fathers for a nod of condescension from the very Gentiles who upset them. In fact, their Judaism is wholly negative in character. A Judaism which has for all its mainsprings anti-Semitism, and which finds its only expression in anti-defamation work is a dubious one.

Perfervid descendants and kinsmen of Spinoza, Heine, or Disraeli invite to their communal functions third-rate ward-heelers, politicians of every description and members of parliament and the Church; and these "sympathetic" Gentiles (and vote-catchers) sonorously ask with Malachi whether we all have not one father and hath not one God created us all. Yet they ignore some of their best friends, who are Jews, when they give similar functions of their own. But these Jews who are fighting anti-Semitism must never callously suggest anything disturbing to their Christian brethren whom they long to embrace so tenderly. Be tactful—meet them half-way—be tolerant. "Tolerance," demand these slaves still lusting for the fleshpots of Egypt. How does Achad Ha'Am diagnose this disease of the spirit? "Slavery in Freedom!" It is perhaps not entirely an unimportant fact that those Jews whose complete Judaism consists of fighting anti-Semitism are themselves anti-Jewish in their viewpoint—and work. Jewish anti-Semites. . . .

In a recent dispute over "Kashruth" before the Toronto courts these Jews were aroused. What will the Gentiles say? They could not see that it is immaterial what the Gentiles say. That our first thought must be one of refortifying our citadels of strength, of adding to the value of our inner communal life: these things have no interest for them. Dominated by fear, by a sort of "inferiority complex," it does not matter to them that Jewish life in Canada and the United States has seldom been raised above strife and a low exchange of animosities; that our community councils and Kehillas are only absorbed in questions of Kosher meat instead of the great problems of Jewish life. The thing that matters is what we think. But the Jewish anti-Semites have one Torah for which they accept no commentary: What will the Gentiles say?. . . .

There is a great deal more in Judaism and Jewish life on this continent than fighting anti-Semitism; and if we have to fight it earnestly we should do it very differently from the way it is now being opposed. We should use weapons that are tokens of manhood and pride; not those of sycophancy and fawning compromise. We should stand erect and not barter. One is not convinced that it is worth while to sacrifice a glorious heritage for the doubtful possibility of living in a fancied Arcadian simplicity with our neighbours. Must anti-Semitism be combatted unless it is in self-defence against a clear violation of the country's laws? Can something whose ancient form is as old as the Jewish people itself be fought with any degree of success? For anti-Semitism is simply a branch of a sturdy flourishing tree called prejudice. You may cut off a branch of the tree; it will eventually grow again. Until this world changes into that messianic era our sages predicted, until the whole tree of prejudice is uprooted entirely there is no more reason why anti-Semitism should disappear than any other of its single branches. The uprooting of this tree may be many centuries off. In the meantime, as Mr. Lewisohn points out we can best hasten that time by devoting ourselves to our own internal and national welfare.

The Constitutional Issue at Ottawa

Parliament, which surely has some value to us as students, justified Mr. King in declining to meet the Houses and await the verdict. But the same precedent demands that he accept its ultimate decision. Disappointment on the part of those who made such a marvellous advance in one parliament towards victory will explain, though it does not warrant the severe things uttered about the meeting of the Parliament. After all the King's government must be carried on—this is vastly more important than the mechanism by which it is done.

5. The parliament of 1896, however, when Mr. Gladstone resigned on Irish legislation, defeated the new government and the dissolution which had not been granted to Lord Salisbury was at once granted to Mr. Gladstone and no one criticized the action. True, Lord Salisbury had not been refused. He had not asked for dissolution and, as has been shown, he knew too well what was proper to make the request. It is therefore futile to say that no prime minister has in our day been refused what Mr. King asked for. No prime minister in our day has ever dared to ask it, but always recognized that the verdict of the House elected on his own appeal settled his fate. So when Mr. King went to His Excellency to inform him that the House which had been elected on his own appeal would no longer support him, and asked for a second appeal by the same government to the same electorate and on the same issue, namely, an opportunity to govern without dependence on a small third party, he elicited a refusal. This refusal is unprecedented only because the request itself was such as no prime minister in our day even under much graver provocation has ever suggested.

6. Mr. King thereon resigned and, instead of awaiting the advent of the new ministers and holding them responsible in the constitutional manner for the act of the crown, definitely challenged the action of the crown by presenting it as a denial of something which the minister believed to be a proper request. Moreover when, as the result of his resignation, it became needful to wind up the session, his prospective successor, according to well-established usage throughout Victorian days, sought assurances that facilities for such winding up would be forthcoming. Mr. King thought fit to scorn the proposal for conference. Nor apparently did he, according to the Liberal precedents cited, give the crown such assurances as were required to meet the crisis produced by his resignation. So, it now appears, that the Governor-General—again according to well-established usage—sent for another leader in the House of Commons to ascertain what support he could offer to the effort to wind up the public business. The Progressive party met and adopted a resolution which in express terms was intended to guide that leader in his conversation with His Excellency. After this interview with Mr. Forke His Excellency was in a position to entrust Mr. Meighen with the task of carrying on and Mr. Meighen was able to accept at the hands of His Excellency the trust offered him. Neither the Governor-General nor the incoming prime minister deviated by a hair's breadth from the established constitutional usage. The political wisdom and expediency of trusting to such assurances concern politics, not the constitution. The new government met the House and on presenting for final action the pending vote of censure against their predecessors were sustained by a majority such as their predecessors would at any time have found matter for great joy. The policy of the new government was then formally challenged in vain and on that issue the new ministers were well sustained. But on a point of law, highly disputable and sharply contended, they were technically defeated by a majority of one—that one vote being admittedly cast in forgetfulness of an obligation to refrain from voting unless the one with whom he was paired returned to the House. There was nothing to show that on the ground of its policy the government could not carry on, but there was enough to show that the King's government could not be carried on with dignity in such a chamber so constituted. Here was a prime minister accorded support by the very House which had formally condemned the previous government and he now asked for a dissolution and was granted it in the interests not of his party but of carrying on the King's government. Granting the dissolution to one minister and with one kind of status was in no way inconsistent with refusing it to another, with different relation to the House. Nor is there anything inconsistent between refusing to a prime minister a second appeal to the electors from the House which they gave him on a first appeal, and the granting to a new prime minister whose general policy had been sustained by the House a first appeal to the electorate.

The Meaning of the Crown

This review of constitutional usage suggests that the Governor-General represents the permanent and continuous phase of Canadian life, as distinguished from its more transient interests. Only evil will ensue if that office be submerged in the eddies of current political strife. British statesmen of all parties accept the obligation to disregard pique and chagrin in the interests of the crown as the one expression of the entire nation. References to "rebellion" or hints at repeating "1837" come ill from men who may properly expect to be the King's ministers in this country. The constitution works impartially but sometimes to the momentary disadvantage of one party. Patience will soon bring them to see the same factor working havoc with their opponents. To discredit the constitution or its agents will in that second phase work them ill. On the other hand many writers in Conservative papers must feel embarrassed by the memory of hasty utterances last winter. When the game is against us we must all keep our tempers.

The French Republic embodies its continuous life in a President who like our own Governor-General is lifted above party strife by appointment for a fixed term. When, to meet difficulty caused by scandals such as we have recently known, an outcry forced the resignation of President Grevy in 1887, a dangerous blow had been struck at stability; and the great president foresaw what would follow. Nor was he mistaken for two years ago, when M. Herriot won a victory at the polls for the left, he refused to take office until President Millerand resigned. The outlooks for the Republic along that way is now dark indeed.

Our Governor-General, it is true, is appointed by the crown on the approval of the Canadian Government. He speaks like the King, not for the present wearer of the crown, but for the continuous constitutional life of the nation under British parliamentary institutions. Were he selected from among our own retired politicians as some now suggest, he would at every turn be exposed to suspicion of partisan sympathies. Thus to suspect him now is a gratuitous affront. The present discussion concerns his powers and these are in no way to be confused with the method of his appointment. Canadians who are steeped in the constitutional ideas of the United States tend to merge the Governor in a political leader. Some, too, for momentary gain, seek to awaken prejudice on the ground that His Excellency won the love of Canadians as a soldier. Surely this is irrelevant. His action in the present case is not taken under orders from the War Office but as a strict parliamentarian. Mr. Mackenzie King reminds us by his antecedents, at least, that politicians in turn may become fighters. But all such personalities ought to be excluded, and the King's government must be carried on.—The New Outlook.

ANCIENT PALESTINIAN SYNAGOGUE EXCAVATED

The Palestine Department of Antiquities has been carrying on excavations on the site of the ancient synagogue at Chorasin, to the northwest of Capernaum, above Lake Kingereth. Among the relics that were unearthed are many Jewish religious symbols. The synagogue is seen to have been two stories high, the upper story serving as a women's gallery. The stone used was black basalt, which is found in the Galilean hills. There is a seat inscribed in Aramaic Hebrew, reputed to be the seat of Moses. There is an inscription stating that Judah Ben Ishmael built the synagogue and the central stairway. Carvings of pomegranates, dates, citrus, fruit and others have been found. It is thought that the synagogue dates from the second or third century.

Its resources in lumber, mineral, water power, fish, game and scenery, are immense. The land calls for men to cultivate it, and in return will give health, comfort and prosperity.

What settlers say of the soil, climate farming and forest life, is told in a most attractive booklet issued under the direction of the Honourable John S. Martin, Minister of Agriculture for Ontario. Full instructions in regards to acquiring a title to these rich agricultural lands are also given.

Campaign is Launched for Farm School

To take care of the growing financial burdens of the Jewish farm training school, a campaign is being launched now in Toronto and vicinity for a $50,000 fund, under the auspices of the Federated Jewish Farmers of Ontario. The money is to be utilized for taking care of present obligations of the farm school and for further expansion. Frank Newman, of Edmonton, was appointed general manager of the campaign and Edmund Scheuer, honorary treasurer.

After functioning for about two years under difficulties, the Federated Jewish Farmers' Association succeeded in opening their farm school last spring at Georgetown, Ontario, and so far have succeeded in training and placing a number of Jewish young men on various farms in Ontario. The Institution has in its charge twelve men who are receiving training. These, with varying degrees of experience, are progressing in agricultural experience, and the Association hopes to graduate them all by next fall. In addition to lodging and board supplied the men, they also receive payment for their work, one man receiving as high as $30.00 a month. The financial position of the Association does not enable the Institution to accommodate more, although there are many more applicants for farm training. Practically all present students have come from cities in Ontario and did not enter the country as agriculturists. They have chosen this vocation after being engaged in various employments and changed to farming as a matter of choice, not out of necessity.

The farm comprises 400 acres of land, and is equipped with machinery, tractors, horses, barns and stock, which consist of eighty-five head of cattle, three teams of horses, incubators to the capacity of 10,000 eggs, laying houses for about 2,000 hens, twenty-five beehives and over 500 fruit trees. About ten men are coming out from European countries to take up farm training within the next few weeks, and these must be accommodated and cared for.

AVON RIVER POWER COMPANY 5½% BOND ISSUE OF $650,000

Following its action in calling an existing bond issue of $250,000, bearing 6½ per cent. interest rate, the Avon River Power Company, Limited, of Nova Scotia, is offering a new issue of $650,000 of 5½ per cent. 30-year sinking fund gold bonds. The purpose of this new issue is not only to retire the existing bonds but to reimburse the company for the purchase of the Windsor Electric Light Company, Limited, to pay for extensions and improvements made during the past two years, and also to acquire the properties of the Caspereaux River Light, Heat & Power Company. The new issue marks an important stage in hydro-electric development in the eastern section of the Annapolis Valley. The bond issue is being offered by Johnston & Ward, who made the original issue.

The properties that will be secured by the mortgage deed covering the $250,000 bond issue have been valued at $828,600, excluding the Gaspereaux plant and limits, by the Public Utilities Commissions of Nova Scotia. The Commission has in addition approved the issuance of securities to net $160,000 by the Gaspereaux Company, making total assets of $998,600, securing an issue of $650,000, or over $1,500 for each $1,000 bond. The balance of $338,600 over the bond issue is represented by junior securities, preferred and common stock, from which additional funds were secured for acquisition and development purposes. No bonus stock has been issued to anyone.

The earning power of the properties now being consolidated runs far ahead of interest requirements. For the 12 months ended December 31, 1925, gross receipts of the combined companies exceeded $86,000, and with $30,000 for operating and other expenses there remained a balance of $65,000 or more than one and one-half times interest payments on the present issue of $650,000. For the year ended June 30, 1927, it is estimated that net earnings will be $84,000, sufficient to pay bond interest two and one-third times. For the next year, earnings are estimated at $104,000 or nearly three times bond interest.

A sinking fund has been provided for the new bonds, commencing July 1, 1928. The present issue will be known as series "A" and will be dated July 1, 1926, and will mature in 30 years, on July 1, 1956. The bonds will bear interest at 5½ per cent. per annum and will be issued in denominations of $1,000, $500 and $100. They are redeemable at the Company's option in whole at any time, or in part on any interest date on 60 day's notice at 104 up to July 1, 1932; 103 up to July 1, 1938; at 102 up to July 1, 1944; at 101 up to July 1, 1950, and thereafter at par.

Laurentian Fresh Air Camp

What part of your vacation is represented by one dollar? Here's what the Laurentian Fresh Air Camp can do with a dollar:

Mrs. J. ————, a mother of five young children, has undergone several operations and is now extremely underweight and emaciated. Ten dollars a week for three weeks, is giving her a chance to recuperate at Ste. Sophie de Terrebonne.

Mrs. Louis ————, who underwent a serious operation for duodenal ulcer this spring was recommended by the Royal Victoria Hospital for country care, as her one chance for life. Twenty dollars is providing her with a quiet rest and good food at Ste. Sophie.

Mrs. S. ————, suffering from a nervous and intestinal condition, has returned from a fortnight in New Glasgow, sufficiently recovered to take care once again of her household. Could the twenty-four dollars for her vacation have been spent to better advantage?

A young girl of fourteen suffering from a nervous disorder was told by her doctor that she would lose her sight, if her physical condition were not improved. Two children of tubercular parents are suffering with chronic bronchitis. Another girl has fainting spells brought on by weakness. A particularly fine girl is unable to work because of a bone condition. Country quiet, fresh air, good food and lots of it, will give them all a new lease on life. What can you do to help? Whatever it may be, do it at once!

The dog days are here, days full of danger for young babes, and of distress for their poor, tired mothers who must look on, powerless to give their tots the necessary care. Help them, for they cannot help themselves! Send your contributions to Mrs. P. Glickman, 328 Redfern Avenue, or to L. E. Ashkaloney, 188 St. James Street, R. 40.

Additional donations were received from Mrs. B. Weinfinger, Bagg Avenue, Ada Price, Durocher Avenue, and H. Miller, St. Viateur West.

A dance will be held at Ste. Agathe in Greenberg's dance hall on Saturday, August 14, with the Len Howard Orchestra in attendance in aid of this fund. Guests from neighbouring hotels or summer resorts are invited. Help make this a success.
